Bringing Better Health Care to Native Communities

Services for you,
your family,
and your community

Medicare is a Federal program that helps care for the elderly and disabled. Medicare pays for things like hospital care, diabetes screenings, mammograms, cancer screenings, help with quitting smoking, and much more. Medicare provides the shots, tests, and services you need to get healthy—and stay healthy.

Congress passed special laws so that American Indian/Alaska Native people can get Medicare and Medicaid services at our own Indian health facilities.

Enrolling in Medicare and Medicaid brings additional resources to our hospitals and clinics.

This provides more health care to our people, both new services and services that improve your quality of care.

Medicare

Medicaid

Medicaid is a state-run program based on family income that helps people who need health care services. Medicaid pays for services like hospital care, lab work, X-rays, transportation, family planning, pediatric care, and early health screenings for your child. A person can have BOTH Medicare and Medicaid. And your child may be eligible for Medicaid, even if you aren't.

Check with your state Medicaid office to learn about the specific services in your state.

Programs for Families & Children

The State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) offers low-cost health insurance for families and children to help you and your family get the health care services you need. SCHIP covers things like shots, well-baby visits, hospital and emergency care. Your state may have its own name for SCHIP, like the All Kids Act in Oklahoma.
